CHANGING THE CAPITOL.

Three Additional Terraces—A Million Dollars to be Expended in Their Construction.

WASHINGTON, August 13.—Every day when there is not rain you can hear the sound of hammer and trowel at the Capitol building. We boast of having the finest building in the world, and it is probably true, yet the work of improving it goes steadily on. The Senate at last session voted to spend a million dollars in constructing a terrace about the rear front of the Capitol building, for the Capitol, it must be understood, has a front on every side. The object of this expenditure is to add to the present height of the building, and to give some additional room for storage and committee rooms. It is true that the length is 701 feet, and the width 524, and the number of rooms very great, yet it is equally true that the building is crowded, and when the smoke cleared away from the smoke of the Capitol, it was found that the entire floor was under the water level of the river.
